German Neo-Nazi And Anti-Semitic Activity Is Up Sharply

For the first time since World War II, neo-Nazi, anti-Semitic and other extreme right-wing activity rose sharply in West Germany last year, the Minister of the Interior, Paul Lucke, reported. In a report on right-wing radicalism, Mr. Lucke noted that there were 521 confirmed cases of pro-Nazi or anti-Semitic incidents in the Federal Republic during 1965, says Philip Shabecoff, of the New York Times, compared with 171 in the previous year.

Membership in the 113 organizations identified as extreme right-wing increased by more than 6,000 to 28,600. The membership rolls of eleven right-wing political parties rose from 9,700 to 16,300.

In addition, the circulation of extreme right-wing newspapers and periodicals rose by 43,000 to 227,000.

Mr. Lucke said that although only a small percentage of the West German people could be considered right-wing radicals, the flare-up of neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic activities last year had alarmed public authorities.

The Interior Minister reported that much of the right-wing activity could be traced to apolitical symptoms such as drunkenness and insanity.

"However, the fact must not be ignored that a small minority of fanatics and incorrigibles still is trying to disturb the democratic development of the German people and to damage the international reputation of Germany through Nazi smearings and harassment of their fellow citizens," he added.

Mr. Lucke charged that the German National party, the largest right-wing political group, had attempted to hide its pro-Nazi sentiments behind a democratic facade. He also warned the people of West Germany to beware of extreme right-wing culture organizations.

The growing readership of right-wing publications, the report declared, is "potential danger for democracy and calls for heightened vigilance," says the New York Times. It called on the West German public and press to aid government authorities in bringing neo-Nazi and anti-Semitic "political rowdies" to justice.

Meanwhile, the state government of Rhineland-Palatinate ordered the disbanding of a local branch of the Steel Helmet (Stahlhelm) Union of Front Fighters, a paramilitary veterans' organization. The organization's unit in the town of Bad Bergzabern had been under investigation for more than a month on charges that its members had made pro-Nazi and racist speeches.

The police of the Saar reported the desecration of an old Jewish cemetery at Ottweiler, where vandals toppled 28 weather-beaten tomb-stones.

According to the police, Ottweiler is the third Jewish cemetery in the Saar to be devastated by unidentified persons. Another Jewish cemetery was desecrated in Munich. The Munich police said that the identity of one of three young men believed to have uprooted forty tombstones in that cemetery has been established.

According to the police, he is Wolfgang Seeler, a twenty-eight-year-old unskilled construction worker, who is listed in police records as a vagabond and petty criminal. He and his accomplices are still at large, says the New York Times. Several Munich newspapers that had given a prominent display to the desecration have received anonymous threats in the mail.

Matzoh Was Available In Soviet Large Cities, In Smaller Places None Or Not Enough

In a dark corridor at the head of the stairs in Moscow's Central Synagogue about fifty middle-aged and elderly men and woman stood pressed together before an open door. They were waiting for their portion of matzoh, reports Raymond H. Anderson, from Moscow, in the New York Times. It was the last day the synagogue bakeries would produce the unleavened bread for the week-long Passover celebration.

At intervals, a name would be called out from the room, piled high with cartons and bags, and a ration of matzoh would be passed through the crowd to a pair of outstretched arms. Downstairs, small groups of old people chatted in the main hall, and a service was under way in a small side room.

In a courtyard behind the synagogue, dozens of women waited in the warm, spring sunlight with chickens for ritual killing. Two stalwart white roosters, their heads projecting from under the cover of a red plastic bag, stared defiantly at each other for the last time as their owners entered a small shed where the killing was to be done.

On the front steps of the synagogue, on Arkhipov Street in an old section of central Moscow, a foreign visitor struck up a conversation with a roughly clad Jewish man about fifty years old.

After some preliminary discussion on the fine weather and the coming holiday, the man relaxed and began to talk about the matzoh situation in Moscow this year.

"Matzoh, that is not a real problem," he said. "There is plenty in Moscow for everyone. It was not easy getting flour, but the people had saved some from last year and they turned it over to the synagogue."

Flour was withdrawn from the counters of Soviet stores after the wheat crop failure in 1963, and sales of limited quantities have been made only before the country's major holidays, says the New York Times. Accompanying the visitor into the main hall of the synagogue, the man continued in a low voice:

"Things are better now that Khrushchev is gone. Two years ago Americans sent us twenty tons of matzoh, but only two tons were turned over to us — the rest was used to feed chickens."

Restrictions on the baking of matzoh began in the last years of Premier Nikita S. Khrushchev's rule. In 1962, two years before Mr. Khrushchev was removed from power, the state-owned bakeries were prohibited from producing matzoh as well as kulich, the Russian Orthodox Church's traditional Easter cake.

Attempts by synagogues to organize their own bakeries were hampered, and some Jewish leaders were arrested under charges of "profiteering" in matzoh.

This year, Jews say that sufficient matzoh is available in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Odessa, and other large cities. However, it is reliably reported that the matzoh supply in smaller Jewish communities is still inadequate or virtually nonexistent.

The Chief Rabbi of Moscow, Yehuda-Leib Levin, said that the Central Synagogue had been operating two Moscow bakeries this year. The seventy-year-old rabbi, surrounded in his office by hundreds of yellowing books, declared: "Our bakeries began working in January, and we have produced about a ton of matzoh every day, sometimes operating twenty-four hours a day. The Maryna Roshche and Malakhova Synagogues in Moscow also made their own matzoh, and they have enough for all their members."

After having said good-bye to his visitor, the rabbi hurried down the corridor and summoned him back to the office, says the New York Times. In an educated voice, he said:

"One of your Senators, I think his name is Javits, said that the Soviet authorities were interfering with the baking of matzoh — forcing people who brought flour to show their passports and sign declarations to turn over to the Government. This is an absolute lie! Nobody had to show his passport, and the only thing they had to sign was a receipt showing that they had turned in flour."

Some Jews Will Be Eligible To Vote Or Run For Office In Arab Election

Adults among the more than two million Palestinians outside Israel will elect their first "National Assembly" this year, Ahmed Shukairy, chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, announced in Jerusalem. Plans for the election are the result of a new agreement by the organization and the Government of Jordan, reports Thomas F. Brady, in the New York Times. The agreement appears to halt, temporarily at least, the long-standing conflict between the Government and Mr. Shukairy and his followers.

Jordan has long objected to the "state-within-a-state" aspect of the organization, chiefly because more than two-thirds of the present population of Jordan is of Palestinian origin.

According to Mr. Shukairy, Jordanian voting rolls will be made available to his organization for preparation of its own rolls.

Election rules adopted by the Palestine Liberation Organization define voters as all Palestinians over eighteen and outside Israel. The age qualification means that the electorate will be a little more than half the total number of Palestinians.

Jews and Christians, as well as Moslems or Palestinians of any other faith, will be eligible to vote or run for office, according to the liberation organization, because there are no religious qualifications.

The number of Jews involved is negligible — a handful who have remained in the Jordanian sector of Jerusalem and its environs, and about 300 Samaritans living near Nablus, who differ from Orthodox Jews in that they accept only the Pentateuch, or first five books of the Bible, as their holy scripture.

However, the Palestinians regard the inclusion of the Jews as significant in that it marks the distinction they make between Jews in general, with whom they have no quarrel, and their enemies, the Israelis. The bulk of the Arab exodus from what is now Israeli territory took place eighteen years ago this spring, so there will be relatively few voters "born in exile."

In addition to the refugees, the native residents of the Gaza Strip, now administered by the United Arab Republic, and of the west bank of the Jordan River, which is now a part of the Kingdom of Jordan, will be included in the electorate.

The Gaza Strip and the west bank region were parts of the British Mandate of Palestine, broken up in 1948 when Israel was formed.

The new National Assembly of the Palestine Liberation Organization will have one hundred and fifty members, Mr. Shukairy said. Sixty will be elected by the Jordanian Palestinians — 698,000 refugees and about 600,000 native residents of the west bank. Their representation will thus be some-

Israeli Voluntary Retrenchment Movement To Combat Inflation Was Started By Professors

Israel's leaders have joined in the voluntary movement to forego back pay and wage increases in order to combat inflationary tendencies. The movement was started by professors and senior lecturers at the Hebrew University after the presentation, on 14 February, of Pinhas Sapir's budget, which provided for increased taxation to meet the cost of wage increases, especially for civil servants, granted last year, says the Israel Digest. The academic pioneers were followed by dozens of individuals, staff committees and trade union groups in factories, offices, and institutions all over the country.

The movement was given a considerable fillip by Prime Minister Levi Eshkol's broadcast address to the nation on 21 February announcing, in response, cuts in the proposed taxes and in Government expenditure.

Prime Minister Eshkol told listeners that the Government would cut its expenditures by IL 100 million as part of a new national retrenchment effort. He also announced the cancellation of the tax increases on cooking gas and solar oil, and a IL 25-million additional subsidy to hold down prices of essential food-stuffs like milk, eggs, and vegetables.

In his 15-minute recorded address, the Prime Minister appealed to all sectors of the population for restraint in order to assure the stability of the economy. The Government's action was made possible, he explained, by the new sense of national responsibility which had expressed itself in the offers by various groups to forego part of wage increases due to them. Mr. Eshkol said that this movement gave evidence that the self-seeking thirst for goods and higher wages which marked the past five years was giving way to a new concern for the general interest, says Israel Digest.

The Minister of Finance, Mr. Pinhas Sapir, announced the Budget changes in the Knesset a few hours before the Prime Minister's radio address. The Cabinet met in special session the same night to approve details of the IL 100-million cut in Government expenditure announced by Mr. Eshkol. These revisions were incorporated in the draft budget which had already been tabled in the Knesset.

After hearing the Prime Minister's speech, the Committee of Hebrew University professors and senior lecturers decided to recommend that the faculty waive a sizeable part of their retroactive pay, as the conditions set when the original gesture was made had been met. The amounts involved ranged from IL 1,000 to IL 2,000.

On 28 February, Israel Kargman, chairman of the Knesset Finance Committee, announced that the President, the Cabinet and the State Controller had stated that they would forego any rises in their salaries. Since the salaries of Knesset Members are linked to those of Ministers, they will also remain at the present level.

Mr. Kargman stated that his committee, which determines the salaries of these office-holders, had sought to raise them in January. The President requested, however, that his salary be not raised, and the Prime Minister informed Mr. Kargman that all the Cabinet Ministers had agreed to waive all retroactive pay as well, says Israel Digest.

The President's salary will therefore remain at its December 1962 level, and those of the Ministers, the State Controller and the Knesset Members at the level of January 1964.

Letters, cables and telephone calls inundated the Prime Minister's Office and the Treasury in response to the Premier's address. Offers to waive part of retroactive pay, the c-o-l allowance, compulsory savings, wages and even pensions came in from private individuals and works committees daily. The police force surrendered one-fifth of the retroactive pay due to them.

The official spokesman stated that the Government was making a point of taking no part in organizing or guiding this spontaneous movement. Asked what would be done with the money, he replied that sums waived by employees of social and educational institutions would be left with the institutions to further their work, and contributions from civil servants would go to the State's reserves.

Donations by employees of private firms would ease their cost situation, with the proviso that this would help them to keep prices stable. In any event, none of the contributions would be used by the Government to finance its own expenditure, the spokesman said.

"I do not know any other country where thousands of people have surrendered a part of their wages of their own free will in time of peace. This is a most encouraging event, which we hope will mark a turning-point in Israel's economic development."

Extended Convalescent Facilities Called Medical Need

Provision of extended facilities for convalescence in institutions other than the general care hospitals of the city is becoming increasingly recognized as an important need in medical circles, according to Dr. George D. Little, president of the Julius Richardson Memorial Hospital, at its 26th annual meeting.

After five years of the Provincial Hospital Insurance Service, "we have good reason to appreciate the most helpful support of the Ministry of Health, and the very satisfactory relationship between the service and the hospitals," Dr. Little said. The hospital has recognized the need for rigid economy in the overall procedures governing the various hospital insurance services. But, "whilst we make every effort to operate within the budget as approved, we must take care that our high standard of patient care is maintained."

Operating costs for the year 1965 at $12.00 per patient day compared favourably with a figure of $11.51 for 1964. Dr. Little attributed the increase to a general advance in costs of supplies and materials and a slight addition to salaries.

Dr. Little also thanked the medical board for their services during the year, stating that this was a most important factor in sustaining the best possible care for the patients. Dr. Little also expressed warm appreciation of the high value of services performed on behalf of the hospital by the Women's Auxiliary.

The directors for the fiscal year 1966 were elected, and at a subsequent board meeting, officers for the coming year were appointed: Dr. Little, president; Gordon D. Hulme, vice-president; Lorne C. Webster, secretary-treasurer; Fred Brantley, executive director. Other directors are: K. A. Wilson, Q.C.; W. N. Clelland; E. R. Richardson; F. W. Bradshaw; and Dr. Donald W. Ruddick.

what low in proportion to their number.

Thirty members will be elected from the Gaza Strip, where there are 302,000 refugees and 140,000 native residents.

The 162,000 Palestinian refugees in Lebanon and the 138,000 in Syria will elect twenty-four members twelve from each country.

Five seats will be filled by designated, rather than elected, representatives of the Palestine Liberation Army, which exists only in Syria and the Gaza Strip, says the New York Times. The remaining seats will be filled by elected representatives of Palestinians in other Arab countries — the largest number, seven, to come from Kuwait — and by representatives of "émigrés" outside the Arab world, according to Mr. Shukairy.

SPECIAL JUSTICE DEPARTMENT COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS PRISON TERMS

mail privileges for distributing hate material.

In its recommendations, the Cohen committee defined the identifiable groups or targets of hate propaganda as "any section of the public distinguished by religion, color, race, language, ethnic, or national origins."

Political groups are not among those that the committee recommended be protected from hate propaganda.

At a press conference after the report was tabled, Dean Cohen made it clear that the greatest problem the committee had had to wrestle with was balancing freedom of expression with the need for some form of controls on hate propaganda.

"Can you have maximum free debate, at the same time permitting harmful attacks on readily identifiable groups?"

Implicit in the committee's supplementary recommendations, is some sort of control over broadcasts giving public exposure to disseminators of hate propaganda. The committee singled out open-line and hot-line radio programs for criticism.

In the conclusion to its survey of hate materials in Canada, the committee stated: "Nor does giving some of these hate promoters a radio and television platform serve any valid debating purpose.

The committee is aware that radio, and particularly television, may expose malice and fraud for what it is, but such a view of affording an electronic audience to hate promoters does not take into account the effects of hate arguments and pseudo-facts on uncritical and receptive minds. The broadcasting of hate, therefore, whether for news or exposure purposes, should be carefully disciplined by those in charge.

"Indeed, the committee feels that in recent years some radio and TV producers, with the best of intentions, have been mistaken in their belief that exposure of this kind will destroy the virus. But, whatever the validity of these views, they do not justify giving propagandists a mass platform as if what they had to say was a normal debate on real issues. Plainly it is not".

At the press conference, Dean Cohen was asked specifically about the CBC television program, "This Hour Has Seven Days", which in 1964, ran an interview with George Lincoln Rockwell, leader of the U.S. Nazi party, and in 1965, with David Stanley and John Ross Taylor.

Dean Cohen said he felt that the CBC had been overly enthusiastic in its attempts to present all points of view and should be more cautious in the future. This type of program, he said, is watched by too many people who are susceptible to mass hatred.

"These programs may persuade persons who are on the verge of persuation", he told newsmen.

The committee was appointed in January, 1965, by the then Justice Minister Guy Favreau. Its report was unanimous. The other members were: J. A. Corry, principal of Queen's University; Rev. Gerard Dion, Faculty of Social Sciences, Laval University; Saul Hayes, executive vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress; Mark R. MacGuigan, Associate Professor of Law, University of Toronto; Shane MacKay, executive editor, Winnipeg Free Press; and Pierre Elliott Trudeau, currently parliamentary secretary to Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson.

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO 'PLEASE'?

By Evelyn S. Ringold (Mrs. Herbert H. Ringold), 1204 Stratford Avenue, Melrose Park, Pennsylvania; from the New York Times Magazine; reprinted by permission. Mrs. Ringold was born in Winnipeg, Manitoba; and brought up in New York, and Boston, Massachusetts

"The manners of the children who come into our house are terrible. They wolf their food. Use their fingers. Treat my wife and me like overaged zombies — or ignore us completely. They're totally concerned with consensual validation — that's a sociological term meaning they care only about their peers. But—" wound up a suburban father, "ask my wife. She may think they're O.K. She's child-oriented."

The reaction of this father of three epitomizes the attitude of many parents on the matter of teen-age manners. Adults know what they see as they drive car pools, travel in public and answer their own doorbells — but they are hesitant to deplore it lest they be charged with lack of understanding and sympathy for youth.

Many adults modestly assume that their own observations are personal and limited. They hesitate to judge the intrinsic worth of a youngster by his manners and appearance. They know that the older generation has been decrying the customs of the young since society began — viz. Plautus, who wrote around 200 B.C.: "Manners are always declining." Others, not cowed by a sense of history — "we have to live with them now" — respond with a yelp of disapproval to party-crashing, total disregard for elders, the uncombed hair of the boys and the overcombed hair of the girls. The more child-centered, knowledgeable about "the turbulent feelings of adolescence," "the need for rebellion" and "peer approval" force themselves into an attitude of understanding to forestall an immediate reaction of revulsion — even resentment.

No matter how adults react, however, they do have the distinct impression that manners among the young have suffered an undeniable decline. Even the simple formalities compulsory in earlier childhoods — the "please's," "thank you's" and "excuse-me's" — are often missing today. Parents observe a casualness in table manners that sometimes borders on the appalling. The more formal courtesies such as rising when introduced to an adult, addressing him by name and holding the door for a woman are rarely extended by contemporary teen-agers.

Parents note casual manners and mannerisms that match the omnipresent skinny pants and chewing gum. They see the extreme casualness of hair clips and sausage-sized rollers worn in the subways, in the elevators of Fifth Avenue department stores and in college lecture halls. They see short shorts and bare feet on a young girl walking her poodle on Park Avenue. They see boys with crumpled chinos, an unfresh shirt and little evidence of a recent shave, haircut or shower arriving for dates with pretty teen-age daughters in their "best."

Teen-age manners are probably the most disturbing where "peer culture" reigns supreme — at the local movies, where there is often more dialogue and action in the audience than on the screen, and at the hamburger hangout, where adolescents have been known to upset toothpicks, mustard jars, sugar bowls and the nerves of all adults within earshot.

A child analyst in Philadelphia told me, "I do not go where teen-agers go. No sensible adult would!" An official in the Winnetka school system said, "I wouldn't be caught dead in a suburban movie on a Friday night." Amy Vanderbilt, an authority on good manners, disagrees with this resignation. "It is the responsibility of the theater," says Miss Vanderbilt, "to see that everyone who buys a ticket can enjoy the performance."

Boys and girls defend their "hangout" manners. "It's hard to bother with 'please' and 'thank you' when you're ordering 'four shakes' into a little box," points out the editor of the newspaper in a large, urban high school. The assistant editor added: "Sometimes waitresses and drugstore clerks have no manners with us. They throw down the silver and growl 'What do you want?' They make all of us feel like juvenile delinquents."

Both children and parents agree, however, that mass behavior brings out mischief, latent hostilities and trouble. A psychiatrist says: "Kids wander around in packs, charged with unused energies, anxious to show how daring they are . . ." A high-school senior sees it from the inside: "One kid starts clowning. He's showing off. Without his crowd — he wouldn't act that way."

Parents are familiar with group behavior and group approval as the trademarks of adolescence — itself a challenging condition that overhangs and obscures the issue of teen-age manners. But more and more parents are coming face to face with the question: how much must be excused in the name of adolescence and its classical accompaniment, rebellion? When current teen-age standards conflict with adult standards what gives way?

Of course it is a matter of degree. Outright misbehavior and destructive manners — such as destroying property at a party — are obviously close to vandalism or delinquency, and call for clear-cut action. But a strong, outspoken minority of adults sees an equally portentous and insidious lowering of standards in the prevailing thoughtlessness and sloppiness currently classified as "casual." This somewhat bitter minority feels we have crossed the borderline of good taste and sense.

Criticism of manners is almost indistinguishable from a deeper criticism of the current crop of children. "While they may eventually learn to say 'Thank you,' will they ever learn to feel it?" asks one disenchanted adult. "These children have been the center of our attention so long, they have naturally become the center of their own attention. No one has trained them in the theory and practice of thinking of the next fellow — especially if that fellow happens to be a parent!"

Obviously, something has gone wrong. But what? While it is generally accepted that manners begin in the home, all the evidence points to considerable backing and filling on the part of parents. Even those parents who believe deeply in good manners hesitate to drill their children in the forms.

A mother of two girls and one boy says: "I was insistent on teaching manners when my children were young, because I did not want to be embarrassed by their behavior. But I had the guilty feeling that I was too insistent, that it was no longer considered important to teach young children their manners."

This view that "it's not important to teach manners" is undoubtedly still held by many parents in the deluge of contemporary insights into childhood. It is felt that the age-old insistences: "Don't slouch over your food"; "Don't forget to thank Mary's mother when you leave the party"; "say 'Please pass the bread' not 'Pass the bread!'" will not produce manners but only a resentful set in the child against manners. There is also the feeling that real manners are not rooted in the outward formalities, such as shaking hands and saying the proper "how-do-you-do's," but rather in an ingrained sensitivity to and consideration for other people. "Such a child," a mother tells me, confidently, "will have an attractive manner, if not rule-book manners."

Still another viewpoint expressed with some heat, brushes aside the question of manners. "Kids should be thinking of more important things — how to work out racial tensions, their love lives, their views on existentialism. Our kids are too blasé. They don't need more manners. They need more involvement."

This attitude, however, brings forth fierce contradictions from other parents. "Consideration!" echoed one father. "Children are little animals that have to be civilized. We have to lead them — not follow their instincts."

"Involved!" retorted a mother who has seen her children through high school, college and into early marriage. "The only thing these kids are involved with is themselves — their racial tensions, their love lives. Where are they going to practice the art of living with and adjusting to some one else's needs — if we forgive so much, so quickly, in the name of puberty?"

Plenty of parents are holdouts who refuse to be "modern" — who insist on the forms without too much self-conscious thought, who do not find clean finger nails a threat to mental health. But even among these there are bewildered parents who ruefully confess they are simply unsuccessful in their efforts.

"When the asparagus is served, I don't have to teach my children how to eat it," says one mother. "They take one look and say 'Ugh! Not for me!'" And a father who is a child analyst in the Westchester area says he does insist upon the proprieties with his children, but "I might as well be talking up a wall." In a reflective mood, he adds "perhaps we are not teaching the absolutes with the same absolute convictions as our parents."

Some educators feel that while the home is the source of a child's original manners, there is a definite need to implement the work of the home with additional instruction and incentive from the school.

Miss Ruth E. Bishop, an educational consultant in New York City, familiar with both public and private schools in a wide area, observes that in the more traditional private schools, they do go after table manners and behavior, that faultless manners are implicit and that the boys and girls know when they enter that this code of behavior is expected of them. (She tells of one boarding school for girls in Pennsylvania where a failing mark in deportment means dismissal — no matter how impressive the academic grades.)

In Scarsdale, the parents sponsor an after-school dancing program in the junior high, where, reportedly, children are "as interested in learning the social graces as in learning to dance." Some schools set up situations to practice manners. At Cheltenham High School in suburban Philadelphia, an annual junior-senior reception is designed to give students an experience with introductions on a formal receiving line. In one Ohio high school, the parents turned the senior prom into a dinner dance — against the protests of their children — so that boys and girls would have an opportunity to show off their company manners at the table.

However, not all parents agree that public schools should take a role here. One Great Neck mother, when asked if her school or PTA did "anything about manners," replied flatly: "I hope not. We all have more important things to do. If my daughter wants to know a point of etiquette, she can look it up in a book."

Is the pendulum possibly swinging back to manners? There are many scattered indications of dissatisfaction and a renewed appreciation of what manners mean. Adults, teachers and counsellors are beginning to wonder why children in other eras and other places seem able to go through adolescence without such a disturbing show.

They are weary of hearing comments such as that of a Pakistani member of the United Nations staff: "American children have no respect for adults, for nature or for life."

Child therapists report that youngsters tell them: "I certainly wouldn't let my children get away with the things my folks let me do."

A high school adviser says "Parents have been confusing development with training. A child grows from within, but needs pruning and firm stakes in the process."

Everything points toward a fresh view of manners in the near future. Not a revival of the elaborate superstructure that was torn down with the great old town houses, but a return to simple, workable courtesies based on a recognition of the existence and rights of others. This must be reinforced with knowledge.

Amy Vanderbilt, who considers herself a proponent of "relaxed" good manners, feels that these must be consciously taught and practiced at home from a very young age, in a clear, good-humored way. She says that "whenever I speak before a group, some one in the audience will ask: 'If a child is innately kind and considerate, won't he automatically have good manners?' I reply 'No.' The greatest kindness in the world will not help a child to eat an artichoke in public — or save him the embarrassment if he doesn't know how."

No one seems to be making a brief for the reinstatement of the finger-bowl, nor for what the social-critic Paul Goodman calls "the icy-grin of the upper middle-class." New manners will be a simple blueprint for behavior — a set of expectations and habits designed to make life pleasanter in spite of pressures and tensions; to protect feelings — one's own as well as the other person's. Children will have to be taught to say "thank you" and yield the center of the stage. Such good manners will not be regarded as a mark of pathology in a child, or a bid for status on the part of the parent — but simply as one way in which a child can find acceptance in the eyes of others.

When the parents' job becomes boringly repetitive and seemingly unsuccessful — as it undoubtedly will — some might find refreshing insight into the matter in the views of two children.

A 14-year-old girl says "My manners are best when I'm shy or afraid." A 9-year-old boy writes definitely on the subject: "I have good manners I say good night and good morning. I say hello and good by, and when I see dead things lying around the house I bury them."

ISRAELI VOLUNTARY RETRENCHMENT MOVEMENT TO COMBAT INFLATION

David Horowitz, Governor of the Bank of Israel, told a public meeting in Jerusalem.

Mr. Horowitz said that the need to restrain consumption derived not just from the moral necessity to diminish Israel's dependence on foreign aid. If present trends continued, Israel's trade deficit would soar from the present $500 million to $600 million or $700 million in the next five years, says Israel Digest.

"There are no miracles in this field," he declared. "If incomes mount, prices will go up, whatever we do. No legislation or inspection will help."

Mr. Horowitz announced later that he would waive salary increases due to him.

A Public Council for Economic Stability, set up to co-ordinate the pay renunciation movement, met Prime Minister Levi Eshkol. It consists of 11 organizations, including the Histadrut (the General Federation of Labor), the Farmers' Federation, the Merchants' Association and the coordinating committee of professional men.

Mr. Eshkol told its members that the economic future of the country was in their hands. Through their parent organizations, they could advance Israel's economic independence, he said.

The Premier pointed out that the economic front was a field where Israelis themselves could dictate the future. Every group should be ready to relinquish part of its gains. "This will benefit every sector of the economy," he declared.

He warned that if the general public and the workers failed to adopt measures of self-restraint, the country might be faced with unemployment. "Now is the time not to demand more, but to volunteer to give up much," he said.

He called for higher production among workers, better work morale, and reasonable profits by employers.

The Government, on its part, he said, was introducing more efficient methods among its staff, as well as reducing the number of civil servants. He noted that civil service car allowances had been cut by ten per cent during the past few months and stated that there were more cuts in the offing, says Israel Digest.

The council adopted a resolution calling upon its members to discuss the Prime Minister's proposals with the executives of the various organizations.

Two U.S. Leaders Awarded Honorary Doctorates At Hebrew U.

Samuel Rothberg, of Peoria, Illinois, and Judge Louis E. Levinthal, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, were awarded honorary doctorates at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. The awards were made at a special ceremony during the annual meeting of the International Board of Governors of the Hebrew University. More than one hundred members of the Board, from nine countries, met in Jerusalem.

Mr. Rothberg, chairman of the Board of the American Friends of the Hebrew University, was named an honorary Doctor of Philosophy. Judge Levinthal, chairman of the International Board of Governors, was named honorary Doctor of Law. The degrees were voted by the Senate, the University's supreme academic body.

The citation for Mr. Rothberg's conferment recorded his pioneering in the field of American investment for the economic development of Israel. He was a founder of the Israel Bond Organization and is its national campaign chairman. For years he has been a member of the national campaign cabinet of the United Jewish Appeal. The citation read:

"His services to the University represent a happy combination of inexhaustible energy and wise and sagacious judgment. The American Friends took on a new lease of life when he assumed the reins of leadership. Both in the governing bodies of the American Friends and in the Board of Governors his wise counsel is a source of inspiration and guidance; and the grace and generosity with which he puts into practice his unshakeable faith in the future of Israel and of the Hebrew University provide an unfailing stimulus to all his friends and associates. More recently, Samuel Rothberg crowned all his previous accomplishments on behalf of the University by initiating the idea of the Harry S. Truman Center for the Advancement of Peace at the University, to the establishment of which he is now devoting himself."

Judge Levinthal was cited as: "A devoted Zionist, with a deep and abiding love for Israel and its people, Judge Levinthal has been active in the Zionist movement for the greater part of his life, and served as president of the Zionist Organization of America. The Hebrew University has always been particularly close to his heart, and since 1962 he has headed its Board of Governors."

The participants numbered sixty governors from the United States, Canada, South Africa, Australia, Belgium, England, Holland, and Switzerland, and a similar number from Israel.

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS AND JEWISH IMMIGRANT AID SERVICES MAKE URGENT PLEA TO MINISTER OF IMMIGRATION TO KEEP "THE HUMANE QUALITY OF CANADA" IN SIGHT IF CHANGES ARE CONTEMPLATED

An urgent plea that any changes in the Immigration Act should not disturb that feature of Canada's immigration policy which has stood it in good stead being its underlying desire to allow reunion of families and joinder of families was made to the Hon. Jean Marchand, Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in Ottawa by a joint delegation of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Referring to the recently tabled report of Joseph Sedgwick, Q.C., who was commissioned by the government to investigate immigration procedures, the delegation stated that although the report may have great validity in certain aspects, the government should bear in mind that, if any attempts are made to change administrative procedures and to make immigration rules more efficient, sight should not be lost of the humane quality of Canada as a "have" country with enormous resources, with the corresponding duty to discharge its universal moral obligations which would be substantially hampered if efficiency were to remove those qualities.

The delegation pleaded for the retention of the sponsorship of relatives and close relatives and pointed out that the history of such immigration over the past number of years has given ample proof of the success of this method.

The delegation also referred to the inferences of the Sedgwick recommendation that newcomers are in a lower level of humanity and must be carefully watched.

The delegation was led by Saul Hayes, Q.C., executive vice president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, and included: Monroe Abbey, Q.C.; Lavy Becker, Samuel Harvey (Montreal); Louis Herman; J. B. Goldlist (Toronto) for Congress; and Louis Orenstein, Q.C.; George Hollinger, and Dr. Joseph Kage, for JIAS.

The delegation also discussed the following issues: continuation of the North African immigration project with special reference to the two-year residence requirement for sponsors; prolonged delays in processing family reunion cases; prolonged delays in processing of OS.8 applications (OS.8 cases are those where labour shortage permits the entry of those with the occupational skill required on the labour market); Romanian refugee cases in Italy; immigration from India; applications from certain Iron Curtain countries; co-sponsorship of individual cases; immigration from the USSR.

Two Year Residence Moroccan Sponsors:

On December 7, 1964, a JIAS letter was addressed to the Director of Policy and Planning, Department of Immigration, Ottawa, containing the following paragraph regarding the two-year residence requirement for sponsors:

"Pertaining to applications submitted by recent arrivals from Morocco and Tunisia on behalf of their first-degree relatives, as mentioned during our discussion, letters received from your office indicate that the sponsors' two-year residence clause is invoked where applications submitted on forms 55 are concerned. We should be most grateful if form 55 applications would be processed in a manner similar to that of OS.8 requests and that the sponsors' two-year Canadian residence be waived."

An interim reply was received that the matter was under consideration and subsequently a letter dated April 9, 1965, was received from the Director, Special Services, stating that "pending completion of the review of Jewish immigration from North Africa, the two-year residence requirements have been set aside and applications from such sponsors will be dealt with when received."

There has been evidence recently, however, that the two-year residence for Moroccan sponsors has, in fact, been reinstituted. There is a number of pending cases in Montreal and Toronto on which no action is being taken by the Immigration Department and, of course, unless the two-year residence for Moroccan sponsors is waived, all future applications by recently arrived newcomers will be affected and the delegation, therefore, requested resumption of the previous procedure.

Prolonged Delays in Processing Family Reunion Cases:

There appears to be a serious "blockage" in Madrid in processing Moroccan cases on whose behalf applications have been submitted by their relatives in Canada and advisory approvals received and forwarded overseas.

Prolonged Delays in Processing OS.8 Applications:

Since May, 1965, about 190 OS.8 applications (about 125 family units) on behalf of some 525 persons were submitted. No action, as far as is known, has been taken as yet. Judging from past experience, these applications will, no doubt, increase as time goes on and the Minister was asked to arrange a speed-up of such cases.

Romanian Refugee Cases in Italy:

Romanian refugees in Italy have been subjected to unusually long delays and this results in great hardship to all concerned. Jewish refugees leave Romania and when they reach Italy request to be processed for Canada. Often in the case of the Canadian applicants, the relatives in Canada request that they be held over in Italy until their immigration to Canada can be arranged. The Minister was informed that we contact overseas offices of the United Hias Service and appropriate arrangements are made with the Jewish Agency and the American Joint Distribution Committee for them to be looked after in Italy until they receive visas.

In most instances, an application for their admission to Canada is filed by their Canadian relatives. The proposed immigrants are refugees in fact and moreover United Hias Service, Italy, is usually able to arrange for their official refugee status through the appropriate authorities such as the UNHCR, etc.

Refugees have not been, as a rule, subjected to the two-year residence clause, although it is conceivable that in some instances the Canadian authorities may wish to institute additional inquiries.

Congress-Jias delegation requested Ottawa to review the matter with their officials in Italy and re-interpret to them again the long-term understanding, with reference to Jewish refugees from Romania.

Immigration from India:

During the past few months many inquiries have come from Jewish residents of India concerning immigration to Canada. Judging from information received, most of the inquirers are of satisfactory educational background and appear to be desirable immigrants. As of December, 1965, JIAS submitted to the Canadian Attache in India, 105 OS.8 forms (about 80 family units comprising about 250 persons). Each application, before it is submitted, is reviewed by the JIAS Immigrant Aid Committee.

In the covering letter which is sent with the application, JIAS states its interest in the case and that it will receive the families upon arrival in Canada and place at their disposal the facilities of the Jewish Community Social Services and help them to make a satisfactory adjustment. The United Jewish Relief Agencies of Canadian Jewish Congress backs up this commitment and is responsible for the financial allocations for this program out of its annual campaign funds.

Congress-Jias delegation requested Ottawa to inform their Attache in New Delhi as to the nature of our undertaking and co-sponsorship so that he may deal with applications in the light of this undertaking regarding reception and aid. This may accelerate the processing of the cases.

Applications from certain Iron Curtain countries:

At this time only Canadian citizens can file applications for admission of their relatives of first-degree from certain Eastern European countries such as Poland, Hungary, etc. Congress-Jias delegation discussed the possibility of easing these regulations with a view of accepting applications from those who are not as yet citizens, but have been residing in Canada for a few years.

Co-sponsorship of individual cases:

There are occasionally sponsors who are unable to show satisfactory settlement arrangements. This may pertain to relatives of first-degree or kin from Romania, Hungary, etc. who have reached a country in Western Europe and whose kin in Canada have applied for their admission as refugees. The present policy of the Department in general, precludes co-sponsorship, and if the settlement arrangements shown by the sponsor are not satisfactory, the application is kept in abeyance. Congress-Jias delegation suggested that in certain cases of this nature, the government should recognize our co-sponsorship.

Immigration from USSR:

The difficulties connected with immigration from USSR are numerous. It is clear, however, that if a start is to be made in this area, Congress-Jias would need the cooperation of the Department of Immigration by obtaining its approval of applications filed on behalf of first-degree relatives. The Congress-Jias delegation suggested that the Department consider such applications filed by Canadian citizens. Of course, it is not known whether exit visas would be granted, but no attempt could be made to induce the Soviet authorities to grant such visas unless there is some evidence that Canada is prepared to admit would-be immigrants from the USSR.

A Congress-Jias submission has become an almost annual discussion with the Minister reviewing the immigration picture and accenting the Jewish phases requiring action.

In the late '40's, when the possibilities for immigration were beginning to form an important part of the agenda of the Canadian Jewish community, the Canadian Jewish Congress acting on behalf of the community, entered into an agreement with the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services for the joint prosecution of immigration ventures.

Canadian Jewish Congress being responsible for the implementation of such guarantees as were jointly decided upon, joint representations would be made at various levels of government for the fullest possible entry of Jewish refugees and others opting for Canadian settlement. Initial settlement and integration expenses being borne by Canadian Jewish Congress (through United Jewish Relief Agencies of Congress) on behalf of the JIAS and also the Jewish Child and Family Service Bureaux.

1966 Independence Day Coin To Mark 18th Anniversary Of Israel

The Bank of Israel has announced that the 1966 Independence Day coin will be issued April 25 to mark the 18th anniversary of Israel's independence. The silver coin will have a face value of five Israeli pounds, writes Cale B. Jarvis, in the Toronto Globe and Mail. It will measure 34 mm in diameter and weigh 25 grams.

Eighteen has particular significance for Israel since the Hebrew characters that denote this number also spell the word "chai," meaning life. The coin might, therefore, be referred to as the crown of life. For hundreds of years the phrase "Am Yisrael Chai," "the people of Israel live on," has been a rallying term for Jews throughout the world. This phrase, which is said to have originated with King David, is incorporated in the design of the new coin.

A stylized inscription of the Hebrew words, designed in the form of a tower, occupies the reverse of the coin.

The obverse carries the inscription, Israel, in Hebrew and Arabic. It also has the date, 1966, and its equivalent in the Hebrew calendar along with the Arabic numeral 5. Along the rim, next to the numeral, are the Hebrew words denoting Israel pounds.

The coin was designed by Israeli artist, Selig Segal, and was minted at the Royal Dutch Mint, at Utrecht. About 10,500 proof and 32,500 uncirculated coins have been produced. Apart from the quantities automatically allocated to permanent subscribers to Israel's coins and medals, the coins will be made available to Canadians prior to April 25, through Hobin Investments Ltd., 1091 Wellington Street, Ottawa.

Israel first began issuing silver Independence Day coins in 1958. A new coin has been issued each year since then.

SPECIAL JUSTICE DEPARTMENT COMMITTEE RECOMMENDS PRISON TERMS FOR HATEMONGERS

By Geoffrey Stevens, in the Toronto Globe and Mail

A special Justice Department committee has recommended Criminal Code amendments to outlaw hate propaganda.

In a 327-page report, the committee, headed by Maxwell Cohen, Dean of Law at McGill University, proposed maximum prison sentences of two and five years for different types of group defamation.

Solicitor-General Lawrence Pennell tabled the report, date November 10, 1965, in the Commons and said the Government was giving it very serious study. He told Opposition Leader John Diefenbaker, however, that he was not in a position to give an undertaking that the Government would introduce legislation based on the recommendations.

The committee broke hate propaganda down into three classes which it said should be covered by amendments to the Criminal Code. They are:

Advocating or promoting genocide, maximum sentence five years;

Inciting hatred or contempt against any identifiable group, by communicating statements in a public place, where such incitement is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, two years;

Wilfully promoting hatred or contempt against any identifiable group, by communicating statements, two years.

The second category would largely cover public meetings while the third deals with most forms of so-called hate literature.

The committee termed hate propaganda a serious problem, but said it would be a mistake to consider it to be of crisis or near-crisis proportions.

It also brought in supplementary recommendations designed to make uniform the regulations and legislation on hate propaganda as they related to various government agencies and departments. The committee suggested a review of Criminal Code provisions covering public use of insulting language and the use of the mails to distribute obscene, indecent, immoral, and scurrilous material.

The committee also asked the Government to study the question of seizing hate materials and confiscating them after a conviction is registered.

The effect of the recommendations, if implemented, would be to place hate propaganda or group defamation on much the same legal ground as defamation, libel, and slander of individuals.

Under the committee's proposals, however, the Crown would face greater difficulty gaining a conviction for group defamation.

"Generalizations about groups play a more vital role in public discussion than do statements about individuals," the committee stated. "There may be no public benefit whatever even to true disclosures about individuals, whereas there will almost always, if not always, be a public benefit to be derived from true statements about groups.

"In our opinion, therefore, it is necessary to provide the unqualified defense of truth in order adequately to protect all legitimate dialogue against legal restraints."

The report was tabled just after a private bill was introduced by Wallace Nesbitt (PC, Oxford) to provide for the inclusion of hate literature in a section of the Criminal Code dealing with group defamatory libel.

Mr. Nesbitt said it would provide that a person convicted of distributing hate literature be placed under mental observation. Such material was the product of sick minds, he said.

In its recommendations, the committee spelled out the grounds on which a conviction should not be registered. They are: where the defendant proves his statements are true; where he proves that they are relevant to any subject of public interest, public discussion of which is for the public benefit, and that on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true.

At present, the Government's authority to control hate literature, in particular, is largely restricted to customs power to stop the import of such materials and to suspension or cancellation of postal privileges.

In the past 18 months, two individuals, David Stanley of Toronto, and John Ross Taylor, of Gooderham, Ont.; and three organizations, the U.S. National States Rights Party; also Natural Order; and Canadian Publications, both of Gooderham, have lost
